CvSU conducts relief for Taal evacuees

The Carile State University (CvSU) continues to partner with local government units and community groups in its Taal Operations 2020 to provide relief for victims of the Taal Volcano eruption.

"The call of an academic institution is not only to produce quality professionals but to also serve and build a stronger community. This is innate to a university's function, even amid Taal volcano eruption,"

CvSU said in a press release.

Taal Operations 2020 was launched under the CvSU program Office of Research and Extension Life-Changing Initiatives for the Empowerment of Filipinos.

Donation drives were conducted for ready-to-eat food, clothes, bedding, baby supplies, toiletries and other basic needs. Monetary donations from alumni associations and other individuals were used to buy additional items, which were first delivered to evacuation centers in Alifan, Indang and Baler.

ed a psychological first-aid training to equip individuals who would like to assist in giving psychosocial support to evacuees, while psychology students conducted art therapy sessions in child-friendly spaces allocated to the centers. School kits were also given to children who are set to blend in schools near their evacuation camps.

Meanwhile, the College of Veterinary Medicine and Bio-Medical Sciences joined an interagency veterinary mission last Jan. 18, together with the Cavite provincial veterinarian, Cavite Veterinary Medical Association and other stakeholders to give free check-up and medication to 64 horses and 100 dogs and cats in Tagaytay City and Maligaya.

Aside from faculty and students volunteering in evacuation centers, CoSU also opened the Administration Building of the main campus in Linao, Cavite as a free charging station last Jan. 14. Around 90 residents afflicted by the power interruption signed the petition and charged an estimate of 200 pesos.

First childhood flu helps explain why virus hits some people harder than others

Why are some people better able to fight off the flu than others? Part of the answer, according to a new study, is related to the first flu strain we encounter in childhood.

Scientists from UCLA and the University of Arizona have found that people's ability to fight off the flu virus is determined not only by the subtype of flu they have had throughout their lives, but also by the sequence in which they are been infected by the viruses. Their study is published in the open-access journal PLoS Pathogens.

The research offers an explanation for why some people face much worse than others when infected with the same strain of the flu virus, and the findings could help inform strategies for minimizing the effects of the seasonal flu.

Some last Feb. 8, they were monitoring 105 persons for possible

In addition, UCLA scientists, including Professor James Lloyd-Smith, who also was a senior author of the PLoS Pathogens research, recently completed a study that analyzes travel-related screening for the new novel coronavirus 2019-nCoV.

The researchers report that screening travelers is not very effective for the 2019 coronavirus — that it will catch less than half of infected travelers, on average — and that most infected travelers are undetectable, meaning that they have no symptoms yet and are unaware that they have been exposed. So stopping the spread of the virus is not a matter of just enhancing screening methods at airports and other travel hubs.

"This puts the onus on government officials and public health officials to follow up with travelers after they arrive, to isolate them and trace their contacts if they get sick later," said Lloyd-Smith, a UCLA professor of ecology and evolutionary biology. Many governments have started to impose quarantines, or even travel bans, as they realize that screening is not sufficient to stop the spread of the coronavirus.

One major concern, Lloyd-Smith said, is that other countries, especially developing nations, lack the infrastructure and resources for those measures, and are therefore vulnerable to importing the disease.

"Much of the public health world is very concerned about the virus being introduced from Africa or India, where large populations exist but have access to advanced medical services," he said.

The researchers, including scientists from the University of Chicago and the London School of Tropical Hygiene and Medicine, have developed a free online app where people can calculate the effectiveness of travel screening based on a range of parameters.

The PLoS Pathogens study may help solve a problem that had for decades vexed scientists and health care professionals: why the same strain of the flu virus affects people with varying degrees of severity.

A team that included UCLA and Arizona scientists reported in 2016 that exposures to influenza viruses during childhood gives people partial protection for the rest of their lives against distantly related influenza viruses.

DIARYO KABITENYO - February 1 & 10, 2020

The January issue of the Journal of Nuclear Medicine, the alpha-particle-emitting radiopharmaceutical ²²³RaCl₂ not only impacts cells directly hit by radiation but also has significant effects on cells outside of the radiation field (i.e., bystander cells).

Breast cancer is the most common cancer diagnosed in women in the United States. While survival rates for women are high, approximately 20 percent of five-year survivors ultimately develop metastatic disease five to ten years after treatment. The formation of metastases involves circulating tumor cells that shed from the primary tumor and gain access to the circulatory system. These CTCs may sustain active proliferation and develop into micrometastases or may remain dormant for years before becoming active.

"With a renewed interest in therapy with alpha-particle emitters and their potential for sterilizing CTCs, our study sought to determine whether bystander effects play a role in ²²³RaCl₂ therapy and if so, whether they can be leveraged to treat CTCs before disease progression," noted Roger W. Howell, PhD

New therapy option identified for early-stage breast cancer

Radiometallic therapy has proven successful in delaying the growth of disseminated tumor cells (DTCs) in early-stage breast cancer in a small animal model, suggesting its use as a potential adjuvant therapy for retarding the proliferation of DTCs. As reported in

Fruit flies respond to rapid changes in the visual environment

Vision is fundamentally based on the perception of contrast. When light conditions change, the eye needs a certain period of time to adapt and restore its ability to perceive contrast correctly. These processes are relatively well understood. However, researchers at Johannes Gutenberg University Mainz (JGU) have now discovered a mechanism employed by the fruit fly Drosophila melanogaster that broadens our understanding of visual perception. Their results explain why the eye can correctly evaluate contrast even as suddenly changing light conditions. "Fruit flies can do this because they have nerve cells in their visual system that react to luminance. These nerve cells make it possible for the flies to adjust their behavior when visual stimuli dynamically change," explained Professor Marino Silies, head of the research project at JGU.

Sensory systems of living organisms have evolved in a way that they tend to react to change rather than absolute sensory inputs. "For example, you might well forget that you're wearing a necklace during the day, but if an insect lands on your skin you feel it immediately," added Silies. Vision works in the same way, as it is adaptable and designed to respond to changes in the environment. More nerve cells respond to contrasts rather than to luminance itself. That is why many animals have visual systems that work particularly well at dawn, at dusk, in daylight, or in a rapidly changing environment.

The performance of photoreceptors in the retina plays a key role in both vertebrates and invertebrates.

Efficient cryopreservation of genetically modified rat spermatozoa

Rat spermatozoa are two to four times larger than that of other animal species and are easily damaged by changes in pH, osmotic pressure, and temperature. Because these animals are very frequently used in medical research, a cryopreservation method was developed nearly 20 years ago. However, rat spermatozoa moult extremely poor, and unless artificial insemination is performed, at night (10:00-11:00 pm) no offspring will be produced. Furthermore, the number of offspring produced after successful artificial insemination is often lower than normal so the cryopreservation method of rat sperm is not typically considered practical.

To improve cryopreservation methods, Professor Nakagata and

Dr. Takeo of the Center for Animal Resource and Development (CAERD) at Yamaguchi University, Japan, have been searching for methods to retain sperm motility after thawing. They know that the freezing process significantly reduced sperm motility, so they attempted to chill the sperm first to reduce movement as much as possible before freezing.
